

From the Editors

GEPUBLICEEERD OP 26 september 2022

Dear reader,

We hereby present to you September's issue of the ME Global Chronicle, as always, chock-full of news on the latest developments and studies relating to ME across a multitude of countries. Naturally, our attention is primarily focused on the perspective of patients and their experiences with everything ME-related on a global scale.

We are very glad and grateful to be able to publish it on a new website which, despite still being in development, is definitely worth checking out. Moreover, our Facebook page is growing more influential by the day.

The events unfolding in Norway have been alarming, where despite heavy criticism – including by MPs, a large-scale study into the effects of the Lightning Process on ME patients has been given the green light. As well as in the US, where ME, ME/CFS and CFS will be lumped together under the same diagnosis code starting October 1st.

On the other hand, greater individual knowledge of ME among patients has resulted in them gaining a wider influence, both as organizations and as individuals. Future years will show whether the overall brimming hope for ME research receiving a boost due to additional subsidies allotted to Long Covid research, is justified. First we'll see, and then we will believe.

A word of gratitude to all our correspondents. Without your deluge of support and contributions to this issue, it would have never materialized. Our editors' workload is already too heavy. The continuation of this magazine, appreciated by many, rests on your shoulders. If anyone of you feels the capacity to assist, kindly let us know (info@let-me.be).

Hence our request, aimed at not only our regular contributors but also you – the reader: should you come across an interesting tidbit during the next three months you feel deserves attention in December's issue, please send it via e-mail to contribute@let-me.be (deadline is December 1st)

We wish everyone in the northern hemisphere a peaceful, quiet fall season, as well as a promising spring to those down south. Hopefully one that doesn't bring too much sickness along with it!

The editors